Can human development be revitalized to empower people to enact change?

This first issue of the 2010 Volume 53 builds on a sense of hope and the positive qualities of humanity in reframing institutions for development.

The issue boldly sketches out the limitations of the human development concept and its application through the MDGs. The focus of the articles are on development alternatives and the need to enlarge the concept of human development to include environment, culture and the bio sphere. The issue highlights the exciting changes that are happening in the social experiments in Latin America where buen vivir ‘living well’ is being put into action. Another major theme is the integral role that social reproduction and therefore women must play in the move towards collective well-being in the new types of conversations that need to go far beyond mainstream development models and blue prints.

The issue reflect on the imagination, altruism, communitarianism and resourcefulness needed for change as we confront the global systemic crises.
