Rethinking human development through the lens of gender and empowerment...

In a dynamic collection of original articles, commentaries and interviews, this issue discusses and challenges the meaning of gender and empowerment in the context of development. The discussion looks at the empowerment agenda in the UN specifically but also at transnational, national and local levels. Acknowledging that gender encompasses more than just women, the journal engages women, men and trans in order to try to understand why the concept of empowerment has become so emptied and depoliticized in development.

The articles argue for a strategic reengagement with gender and empowerment. They give candid examinations of changing cultural and social norms, sexuality, development institutions and the impact of current systemic crises of governance and economics in various global contexts. The issue outlines the contradictions, tensions and potential of repoliticizing empowerment to address gender relations.
